A bottle of Coca-Cola could be bought for a nickel in the United States between 1885 until well into the 1950s. The company was committed to the fixed five cent price, largely because its vending machines only accepted nickels.